Miss L McLeish

Geography is an interesting, diverse and useful subject. It gives an understanding of what makes our planet tick. Being a good Geographer means being interested in anything you see, hear or read about what is happening to places and environments, both locally and worldwide. Geography is a unique subject as it is accepted as an entrance to some colleges and universities as both a Social Subject and a Science.

Geography has a major role to play in framing and answering key environmental, economic, social and political questions. As a diverse subject, it allows students to obtain a range of learning experiences and skills, which make geography graduates highly attractive to a wide range of future employers.

Many professionals use the skills practiced in geography: urban and regional planners, resource managers, attorneys, legislators, business and political leaders, architects, marketing consultants, engineers and meteorologists.
